Federico Vercellone - Università di Torino

The third seminar focuses on methodological explorations towards architectural research. Four research projects are used as a testbed; from them, the discussion will move through epistemological paradigms related to architectural study between theory and practice. Reading is the linking point between the linguistic study of the use of verbal language in architecture and the morphological analysis of the city. Toward confrontation, the discussion will open the debate on the different reading systems and tools having the goal of describing and identifying discursive practices, diagrammatic representations, relations between tools and taxonomies. The discussion will then move to a reflection about the use of descriptive and analytical researches in transformative and performative ways, opening the floor to participants.
